

Campaign Contributions By Tobacco Interests Quarterly Report: April 2002

These quarterly reports provide regular, detailed updates on the tobacco industry's soft money payments to the Democratic and Republican parties and its campaign contributions to candidates for federal office and sitting members of Congress. Each issue also provides additional information on the tobacco companies' political influence, including new analyses of the correlation between these payments and how members of the U.S. Congress vote on tobacco-related issues.

This report includes the most recent figures from the current election cycle (2001-2002) and the two previous election cycles. Since we are more than half way through the election cycle (which ends December 31, 2002), the contributions for the 2001-2002 cycle are obviously based on incomplete, partial-cycle data. All campaign contributions cited in this report are based on data released by the Federal Election Commission (FEC) on April 2, 2002. The Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids Action Fund and Common Cause will issue the next quarterly report on campaign contributions by tobacco interests in July 2002.

This report details many forms of contributions from tobacco interests, including:

- Direct “hard money” contributions from political action committees (PACs) to elected officials and federal candidates. Since current law prohibits corporations, such as the tobacco companies, from making direct contributions to political candidates out of their own corporate treasuries, the most direct way that tobacco companies contribute to federal candidates is through corporate-run PACs. Tobacco companies establish and administer these PACs in order to collect money from tobacco company executives, employees, and other individuals and committees wishing to promote the interests of the particular tobacco company or the tobacco industry. The tobacco PACs contribute directly to campaign committees in an effort to elect and defeat particular candidates. PAC contributions are referred to as “hard money” because they are regulated under federal election law, and candidates can use them for any legal campaign purpose. By law, PACs can contribute a maximum of $5,000 per candidate per election (a candidate facing a primary and general election can receive up to $10,000 from a PAC).
- Unlimited “soft money” contributions to political parties and committees. Companies get around the restrictions on hard money contributions by contributing “soft money” – unlimited donations that corporations, labor unions and individuals make to political parties. Corporations such as tobacco companies are permitted to make these soft money contributions directly from their corporate treasuries. Soft money donations include donations to the major party committees, as well as contributions to committees affiliated with the major parties, such as dinner committees. The parties in turn use the money to run ads or undertake other activities to influence elections.

- Contributions to non-candidate committees, including the leadership PACs increasingly utilized by politicians seeking favor with their colleagues. In addition to contributing directly to candidate committees, tobacco PACs also contribute to non-candidate committees, primarily leadership PACs established by Members of Congress. Politicians establish leadership PACs as a way of raising money to help fund other candidates' campaigns. These leadership PACs have a dual purpose: they allow contributors, like tobacco companies, to give more money to candidates, and they allow Senators and Representatives who establish these PACs to increase their political influence and power by delivering hard-money campaign contributions to other federal candidates. Tobacco PACs also contribute to committees affiliated with the Democratic and Republican parties and non-party committees. PACs can give up to $15,000 annually to any national party committee and $5,000 annually to any other PAC.

In addition to releasing the most current contribution figures from tobacco companies and their PACs, the quarterly reports will also detail the ways in which the tobacco industry contributions appear to influence the political process, including examining the correlation between tobacco contributions and recent congressional votes.

This quarterly report's development and distribution is meant to provide information and analysis on the tobacco industry's extraordinary and improper political influence, especially in regard to the U.S. Congress and the Federal Government. Toward this end, this report offers a range of information, including data on direct and indirect tobacco industry contributions to Members of Congress, other elected officials, and other candidates for elected office. Nothing in this report is meant in any way to endorse, support, or oppose the election of any candidate, or to indicate any support or opposition to any candidate's election by any of the sponsoring organizations.

Quarterly Highlights

- So far in the 2001-2002 election cycle (from January 1, 2001 to April 2, 2002) the tobacco industry has given $4,311,473 in soft and PAC money to federal candidates, political parties and other political action committees.
- Tobacco companies, along with tobacco company executives and employees, have donated more than $2.6 million in soft money to the Democratic and Republican parties in the 2001-2002 election cycle. Nearly 50 percent of these soft money donations came from Philip Morris.
- In the 2001-2002 election cycle to date, tobacco company PACs have donated $1,124,689 directly to federal candidates, with 77 percent ($864,139) of the total donations going to Republican candidates.
- So far in the 2001-2002 election cycle, tobacco PACs have donated more than $560,000 to non-candidate committees, including Democratic and Republican party committees and leadership PACs established by individual members of Congress.
- Congress has not voted on any significant tobacco legislation this quarter.
- There is legislation pending in Congress to grant the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) authority to regulate tobacco products, including weak bills supported by Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette company, and opposed by the entire public health community. In the House, the main sponsor of the bill supported by Philip Morris is Rep. Tom Davis (R-VA), the chair of the National Republican Congressional Committee, which has received more than $1.9 million in hard and soft money donations from the tobacco industry since 1999. In the Senate, the main sponsor of the FDA bill supported by Philip Morris is Senator Bill Frist (R-TN), head of the Republican National Senatorial Committee, which has received more than $1.6 million in hard and soft money donations from the tobacco industry since 1999.
- Seventeen (17) members of Congress have sponsored the weak FDA bill introduced by Rep. Davis. A total of 117 members have sponsored a much stronger FDA bill introduced by Reps. Ganske (R-IA), Dingell (D-MI) and Waxman (D-CA), and supported by major U.S. public health groups. Since 1999, the sponsors of the Davis bill supported by Philip Morris have received, on average, 19 times as much money from the tobacco industry as the sponsors of the bill supported by the public health community ($10,357 vs. $537).
- Two (2) members of the Senate have co-sponsored the FDA regulation bill introduced by Sen. Frist. Seven (7) members have co-sponsored a much stronger FDA bill introduced by Sen. Harkin (D-IA). Since 1999, the sponsors of the Frist bill have not received any campaign contributions from the tobacco industry. In that same time period, the sponsors of the Harkin bill have received a total of $500 in campaign contributions from the tobacco industry.

All of the figures for the 2001-2002 election cycle are based on incomplete, partial-cycle data released by the FEC April 2, 2002, covering contributions keyed into the FEC database from January 1, 2001 to April 2, 2002.

Overview

Since 1997, tobacco interests have given more than $20 million in political donations to federal candidates, national parties and non-party political action committees. Republican candidates and committees have received 82 percent of the tobacco industry's contributions ($16,850,456) and Democratic candidates and committees have received 17 percent of the industry's contributions ($3,547,474).

The overall total includes $5.8 million in PAC money to federal candidates and $13.2 million in soft money donations to political parties. Tobacco company PACs have also donated more than $1.4 million to non-candidate committees since 1999, including party committees, leadership PACs and other non-party committees.

All of the figures for the 2001-2002 election cycle are based on incomplete, partial-cycle data released by the FEC on April 2, 2002.

'PAC Contributions to Federal Candidates' include contributions to Democratic and Republican candidates for federal office. The table does not reflect contributions to independent candidates, which total $28,750 since 1997 ($5,000 in the 2001-2002 election cycle). The total reflects donations from the political action committees established by tobacco companies only and do not include personal contributions made by tobacco company executives and employees.

'Soft Money to Parties' reflects contributions made by individuals associated with individual tobacco companies as well as contributions from the corporate treasuries of the tobacco companies.

'PAC Contributions to Non-Candidate Committees' include donations from the political action committees established by tobacco companies only and do not include personal contributions made by tobacco company executives and employees.

The totals for the Democratic and Republican committees include party committees (national committees, state committees, and fundraising committees) and non-party committees identified as leadership PACs.

The total for other non-party committees includes donations to non-party committees that are not identified as leadership PACs. Data for PAC contributions to non-candidate committees in the 1997-1998 election cycle are not available.

Tobacco PAC Money to Federal Candidates

Since 1997, the PACs established by tobacco companies to raise and spend money in an effort to elect and defeat candidates have contributed more than $5.8 million to candidates for federal office. The totals for the individual tobacco companies are from their political action committees only and do not include personal contributions made by tobacco company executives and employees. These contributions do include PAC donations to sitting members of Congress as well as challengers and former members of Congress. Over 90 percent of the tobacco PAC donations made thus far in the 2001-2002 cycle have been to current members of Congress. So far in the 2001-2002 election cycle, these PACs have contributed more than $1,124,689 to federal candidates, with Republican candidates receiving nearly three times the amount of contributions as Democratic candidates ($864,139 vs. $255,550).

Current members of the House of Representatives have taken $4 million in tobacco PAC contributions since 1997, including $842,689 in the 2001-2002 election cycle. Current members of the Senate have taken $706,422 in tobacco PAC contributions since 1997, including $180,000 in the 2001-2002 election cycle. A detailed list of tobacco PAC contributions to all current members of Congress and individual challengers for federal office is available in the appendix to this report.

Tobacco Soft Money Totals

Over the years, the tobacco companies have embraced the soft money loophole in national campaign finance laws to contribute millions of dollars to the political parties. Since 1997, the tobacco industry has given $13.2 million in soft money donations to the Democratic and Republican parties. Eighty-six (86) percent of the soft money donations went to the Republican party ($11,370,762) and 14 percent went to the Democratic party ($1,856,165). The soft money totals reflect contributions made by individuals associated with individual tobacco companies as well as official company contributions.

So far in the 2001-2002 election cycle, the tobacco industry has given more than $2.6 million in soft money contributions – well over twice as much as the tobacco PACs have given in hard money.

Soft money numbers are from the Center for Responsive Politics (www.opensecrets.org) and Common Cause (www.commoncause.org). Soft money totals reflect contributions made by individuals associated with that organization as well as official company contributions.*

Philip Morris, the nation's largest tobacco company, has consistently been among the very largest soft money donors. Since 1997, Philip Morris's soft money contributions total more than $6.1 million. Other tobacco companies have been major soft money contributors as well. Since 1997, U.S. Tobacco contributed $1.8 million in soft money, R.J. Reynolds contributed more than $1.7 million, and Brown & Williamson made soft money contributions totaling more than $1.2 million.

Tobacco Money to Major Party Committees

The majority of soft money contributions made by tobacco interests (see table on page 7) were directed to the major Republican and Democratic party committees. More than 90 percent of the $7.8 million in soft money contributions tobacco interests made since 1999 went to these major party committees. The balance of the soft money contributions were made to other committees affiliated with the major parties, such as the 2001 President's Dinner Committee. The major party committees that receive the majority of soft money contributions from the tobacco industry are the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), Democratic National Committee (DNC), National Republican Campaign Committee (NRCC), National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), and the Republican National Committee (RNC). Tobacco interests, including tobacco companies, executives and employees, have donated more than $7 million in soft money to the major party committees since 1999, with more than 85 percent going to Republican party committees.

Tobacco interests also donate a significant amount of hard dollars to the major party committees through PAC contributions. Tobacco PACs have donated $78,700 to Republican party committees in the 2001-2002 election cycle ($8,700 to the NRCC and $70,000 to the NRSC). The tobacco company totals in the following table are from their political action committees only and do not include personal contributions made by tobacco company executives and employees. As of data released by the FEC on April 2, 2002, there were no contributions from tobacco PACs to Democratic committees in the 2001-2002 election cycle.

Tobacco PAC Contributions To Party Committees
January 1, 1999 - April 2, 2002 (partial cycle)

Tobacco Money to Leadership PACs

Members of Congress frequently establish PACs separate from their own re-election committees. While these PACs are designated as non-party committees by the FEC, members use these committees, commonly referred to as leadership PACs, to donate hard-money campaign contributions to other federal candidates.

For the purpose of this analysis, we define leadership PACs as those so identified by non-partisan organizations who track money in politics (such as the Center For Responsive Politics, Common Cause and Political Money Line) or other public information sources (such as articles in Roll Call, National Journal, and other publications). These PACs may be affiliated with an individual Member of Congress or a group of members with a common agenda. Although a leadership PAC may be tied to a particular political party or chamber of Congress, these PACs can donate to any federal candidate or committee.

Since 1999, tobacco company PACs have donated more than $1 million to leadership PACs. The totals for the individual tobacco companies are from their political action committees only and do not include personal contributions made by tobacco company executives and employees. So far in the 2001-2002 election cycle, tobacco PACs have contributed $396,932 to leadership PACs ($47,000 to Democratic PACs and $349,932 to Republican PACs).

Tobacco companies have seized the opportunity presented by leadership PACs to solidify and extend their influence. For example, since 1999, tobacco interests have given $55,000 to the New Republican Majority Fund of Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-MS), $69,500 to House Majority Whip Tom DeLay's (R-TX) Americans for a Republican Majority and $88,500 to The Freedom Project, the leadership PAC of Representative John Boehner (R-OH), chair of the Education and Workforce Committee.

Tobacco Money to Other Non-Party Committees

Since 1999, tobacco company PACs have donated $100,350 to non-party committees that are not identified as leadership PACs.

Recipients of PAC Money From Tobacco PACs Among Other Non-Party Committees January 1, 1999 – April 2, 2002 (partial cycle)
Kraft Foods North America	$43,000
Stimson Lane Ltd PAC	$11,500
National Association of Convenience Stores PAC	$8,350
Education and Technology PAC	$6,000
American Meat Institute PAC	$5,000
Grocery Manufacturers of America PAC	$5,000

Camp & Barsh	$1,000
Recording Industry Association	$1,000
Trustmark Insurance Company PAC	$1,000
Hudson Valley Victory Fund	$500
Total	$100,350

More than half of tobacco PAC donations to other non-party committees are donations to affiliated organizations. Philip Morris's PAC transferred $43,000 to the PAC operated by Kraft Foods and $3,000 to the PAC operated by Miller Brewing Company. UST transferred $11,500 to the Stimson Lane Ltd PAC, which it lists as an affiliated group.

Since 1999, Philip Morris's contributions to other non-party committees total $72,500. Other tobacco companies have contributed to non-party committees as well. Since 1999, U.S. Tobacco has contributed $12,500, Brown & Williamson contributed $8,000, and R.J. Reynolds has contributed $4,500 to other non-party committees.

Tobacco Industry Contributions to 527 Groups

"527 groups" are named after Section 527 of the Internal Revenue Code which covers political organizations. Sometimes referred to as "stealth PACs," 527s are political committees formed for the purpose of influencing elections, but do not support or oppose specific candidates.

While members of Congress may only raise limited amounts of hard money for their own campaign committees or leadership PACs, they can raise unlimited soft money from individuals, corporations and unions if they set up a 527 group.

The non-profit consumer group Public Citizen recently released a major study of 527 groups, analyzing the contributions and expenditures of the 25 leading federal politician 527s and non-politician 527s known to exist. According to Public Citizen, "politician 527s" generally serve as soft money arms to leadership PACs and "non-politician 527s" promote issues or partisan orientations.

The full report is available on the Public Citizen website at <http://www.citizen.org/>. Among the reports findings:

- "In the one-year period from July 1, 2000 to June 30, 2001, the top 25 politician 527s collected more than $15.1 million in contributions. (More recent reports are not completely available from the IRS.) This suggests that the top 25 politician 527 groups would collect approximately $30 million in a two-year election cycle."
- "The majority of contributions to the top 25 from July 1, 2000 to June 30, 2001 came from 27 major industries (including individuals, such as executives, associated with these major industries) which gave at least $100,000."

The tobacco industry was among the top contributors, donating $341,286 to the top 25 politician 527s in a one-year period.

- Two tobacco companies – Philip Morris ($153,547) and U.S. Tobacco ($106,500) were among the top 10 corporate contributors to politician 527s.
- In one of three "corporate influence studies," Public Citizen examined tobacco industry contributions to Rep. Tom DeLay's 527 group. His group garnered $131,500 from tobacco interests between July 1, 2000 and June 30, 2001 (amounting to one-fifth of the group's entire receipts). The report states that in October 2001, Delay helped add a provision into the Financial Anti-Terrorism Act at the last minute that would shield tobacco companies from pending foreign lawsuits regarding their alleged non-payment of taxes. Although the House passed the bill, the Senate stripped the tobacco provision from the final legislation.

Cigarette Company Lobbying

In addition to their campaign contributions, the cigarette companies spend millions of dollars to lobby and influence members of the U.S. Congress. According to the most recently available figures, the major cigarette companies spend, on average, $106,415 each legislative day on professional lobbying firms and in-house lobbyists.

Cigarette Company Lobbying Expenditures January 1, 1999 - June 30, 2001
CIGARETTE COMPANY	1999	2000	2001*	Total
1. Philip Morris	$14,700,000	$11,200,000	$5,700,000	$31,600,000
2. Brown & Williamson	$2,300,000	$2,500,000	$820,000	$5,620,000
3. RJ Reynolds	$1,500,000	$1,400,000	$650,000	$3,550,000
4. Lorillard	$1,100,000	$1,400,000	$1,000,000	$3,500,000
TOTAL	$19,601,999	$16,502,000	$8,170,000	$44,270,000

The lobbying expenditures do not include expenses associated with creating and supporting grassroots lobbying efforts. To further support their direct lobbying efforts, the cigarette companies often work to get individual smokers or the owners or employees of tobacco-related businesses to contact their elected representatives in support of tobacco company positions.¹ Internal industry documents revealed in the state tobacco lawsuits show that as early as 1986 Philip Morris alone had a database of nearly three million smokers which it would use to generate letters and phone calls to members of Congress, governors, or other elected officials.²

Tobacco Money and Tobacco Votes

It is difficult to demonstrate links between political contributions and legislative outcomes. However, several past congressional votes reveal a clear relationship between tobacco money and tobacco votes:

- In June 2000, the U.S. House of Representatives voted twice on whether to fund the U.S. Department of Justice lawsuit against the tobacco companies. On the first vote (June 19), the 207 House Members who voted to block funding for the lawsuit had taken, on average, five times as much tobacco PAC money in the previous two election cycles as the 197 who voted to continue funding ($9,712 vs. $1,750). On a subsequent vote (June 23), the 183 Members who voted to cut off funding had taken, on average, nearly seven times as much tobacco PAC money in the previous two cycles as the 215 Members who supported funding for the lawsuit ($10,715 vs. $1,539).
- The tobacco industry's biggest victory over public health policy was the June 1998 defeat in the U.S. Senate of comprehensive tobacco legislation sponsored by Senator John McCain (R-AZ). The bill was defeated by filibuster on June 17, 1998, three votes shy of the 60 votes necessary to end the filibuster. The 42 senators who voted to kill the McCain bill received, on average, nearly four times as much money from the tobacco industry in the two years before their last election as the 57 senators who supported the bill ($17,902 vs. $4,810, with one senator not voting).
- In 1997, the House and Senate voted on funding for enforcement of the FDA's initiative to prevent illegal tobacco sales to minors. In the Senate (September 3), the 28 senators who voted against funding for compliance checks received, on average, more than two and a half times the tobacco PAC contributions in the two years before their last election as the 70 senators who supported the funding ($17,651 vs. $6,840). In the House (July 24), the 248 Members voting against the funding had taken, on average, nearly five times as much tobacco PAC money in the previous cycle as the 177 Members who voted to fund the compliance checks ($5,636 vs. $1,142).

There have been no significant votes on tobacco policy since the October quarterly report. There is legislation pending in Congress to grant the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) authority to regulate tobacco products, including weak bills supported by Philip Morris, the nation's largest tobacco company, and opposed by every major public health organization.

In the Senate, the main sponsor of the weak FDA bill is Senator Bill Frist (R-TN). While Sen. Frist has not accepted any tobacco PAC contributions for his re-election campaign, the Republican National Senatorial Committee, which Senator Frist has chaired since 2000, has accepted more than $1.6 million dollars (hard and soft money contributions) from the tobacco industry since 1999. In the House, the main sponsor of the bill supported by Philip Morris is Rep. Tom Davis (R-VA). Since 1999, Rep. Davis has accepted more than $6,000 in tobacco PAC contributions for his re-election campaign. More importantly, as the chair of the National Republican Congressional Committee, Davis helped raise more than $1.9 million dollars (hard and soft money contributions) from the tobacco industry since 1999.

There are currently 17 members of the House who have sponsored H.R. 2180, the weak FDA regulation bill supported by Philip Morris and introduced by Rep. Davis. Public health groups support H.R. 1097, a bill introduced by Reps. Greg Ganske (R-IA), John Dingell (D-MI) and Henry Waxman (D-CA) that would grant the FDA meaningful, effective authority to regulate tobacco products.

Altogether, the 17 representatives who are sponsoring the Davis bill have received $176,075 in tobacco campaign contributions since 1999, including $103,000 from Philip Morris. Since 1999, the same 17 received, on average, 19 times as much money from the tobacco industry as the 117 representatives who are sponsoring the bill supported by the public health community ($10,357 vs. $537).

The three senators who are sponsoring the Frist bill have not received any tobacco industry contributions since 1999. The eight senators who are sponsoring the Harkin bill have received a total of $500 from the tobacco industry in the same time period.
